SUPER BOWL COMMERCIALS

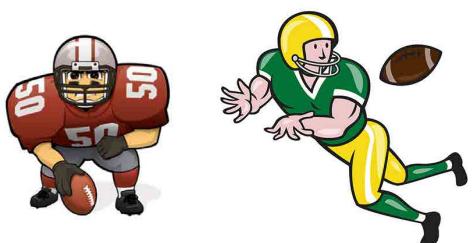

The Super Bowl is the most watched American TV show. That means a lot of viewers for those commercials. Today, there is approximately 45 minutes of commercials compared to 60 minutes of actual game time. The Super Bowl, it seems, has gotten to be the premiere event for TV commercials. Many products will wait to present their latest and best commercial during the game because they know that this is when they'll get the most viewers. Super Bowl XLV had 111 million viewers and was the most watched (as of 2011.) However, this also means that the cost for this captured audience attention is also very pricey for a 30 second commercial. For 2012, the cost has now risen 17% from 2011 and so a commercial is now $3.5 million for 30 seconds. This is double what the commercial ads cost for the Oscars even! And, the ad agencies that create these commercials also look forward to the Super Bowl, when people vote for the best one. This seems to be the time when the ad people compete on TV, while the football players compete on the field.

The 2012 Super Bowl Game was broadcast to 185 countries around the world in 35 different languages.

Below is a chart showing the Super Bowl ad costs through the years and how they've increased.

These commercials live on long after the Super Bowl they premiere in. Some stick in our memories and many can be seen over and over on-line as You Tube videos, and on other websites as well.

THE ORIGINS OF VALENTINE'S DAY

The origins of Valentine's Day are somewhat ambiguous. Many historians trace it back to ancient Roman festivals like Lupercalia, which celebrated fertility and spring. The figure of Cupid, often associated with love, has roots in Greek mythology, particularly the god Eros from 700 B.C. Some believe the holiday emerged in the Middle Ages as a Christian alternative to pagan festivities. The most widely accepted theory is that it was named after Saint Valentine, a 3rd-century martyr. However, it was not until the mid-19th century that Valentine's Day saw a significant commercial boom, transforming into the celebration we recognize today.
